

Above: This stylish hallway has an infrared heater taking centre stage, but it looks more like an expensive piece of art work.

Far left: Proud father Glenn with business partner sons Tim and Matt. Left: Friend Ben is the final part of the 'Jigsaw'.

make infrared heating an exciting choice for the future. They also ease allergens in the home or workplace because they don't circulate dust-filled air; it's scientifically proven that infrared heat helps circulation and blood flow; plus, they reduce moisture so they can reduce black spot mould and damp, which is especially useful in bathrooms, conservatories, gyms and kitchens. Not only this, the pièce de résistance is that they don't really look like heaters. Take the snazzy full-length oblong mirror in neighbour Peter's home, for example. That's a heater.

And the shiny white slimline panel on the wall under the mirror in the hallway, that's a heater too.

Glenn is confident in the product – and his families' abilities to take the reins while he concentrates on living life to the full with Yvonne and travelling to the far-flung places they've always dreamed of visiting. And there's a good chance of some golf being involved.

"I have a fantastic family," gushes Glenn, who also spent 10 years coaching golf, helping tour professionals across Europe and America, before giving it up to focus on his new venture.

"My wife and I married in 2003 after I bombarded her with many proposals from 1999 – finally she agreed. My three children Tim, Matt and Sarah-Louise are a credit, they have all grown up knowing the meaning of working hard to achieve your goals in life. I have four lovely grandchildren and I am a very lucky man.

"My long term aims are now to support Matt, Tim and Ben in building a successful family business – and to play as much golf »